Mrs Tan had two sons. One morning during the holidays, when she was doing the washing for the family, her younger son came and asked her for some money for sweets.

"Sweets are bad for your teeth (13)" Mrs Tan said, "take these two oranges instead and give one to your older brother (14) One of the oranges was a lot bigger than the other and as the small boy liked oranges, he kept that one for himself and gave his brother the smaller one.

When the older boy saw that his brother had a much larger orange than his own, he said to him, "It's selfish to take a bigger one for yourself. If Mother had given me the oranges, I'd have given you the bigger one."

"I know you would. That's why I took it (15)" exclaimed his brother.

This year I decided to do something to regain my reputation as a kind uncle. My (21)
nephew, Tony, had never forgiven me for the dictionary I had bought for him as a birthday present last year. His parents had no reason to be grateful to me either, because the year before, I had presented their dear son with a pot of paste and some funny pictures. Instead of sticking them into a book, Tony had spontaneously covered every wall in the house with them.
(22)
(23)
This year, therefore, I decided to let him choose for himself.

We went into a big toy shop but Tony was highly critical of everything he saw. I showed him toy after toy; he was not to be fascinated by any.
(24)

Read the passage below and answer Questions 26 to 30.

Whenever I go to Westgate, I stay at the Grand Hotel. In spite of its name, it is not very grand, but it is cheap, clean and comfortable, which is what I required. What is more, I know the manager well, so I never have to go through the trouble of reserving a room. The fact that I always get the same room never fails to surprise me. It is situated at the far end of the building and overlooks a beautiful bay.

5

On my last visit, the manager told me that I could have my usual room, but he added apologetically that I might find it a little noisy. So great was the demand for rooms, he told me, that the management had decided to build a new wing. I did not mind this at all. It amused me to think that the dear Grand Hotel was making a determined effort to live up to its name.

10

During the first day, I hardly noticed the noise at all. The room was a little dusty, but that was to be expected. The following afternoon, I borrowed a book from the hotel library and went upstairs to read. No sooner had I sat down, I heard someone hammering loudly on the wall. At first I paid no attention, but after a while I began to feel very uncomfortable. My clothes were slowly being covered with fine white powder. Soon there was so much dust in the room that I began to cough. The hammering was now louder than ever and bits of plaster were coming from the walls. It looked as though the whole building was going to fall! I could tolerate the debris but I just could not tolerate the noise! I went downstairs immediately to complain to the manager. We both returned to the room but everything was very quiet. As we stood there looking at each other, I felt rather ashamed of myself for having dragged him all this way up the stairs for nothing. All of a sudden, the hammering began again and a large brick landed on the floor. Looking up, we saw that a sharp metal tool had forced its way through the wall, making a very large hole right above my bed!

Mary Irwin was coming home. She gazed in silence at her pale reflection as it rocked to and fro in the frosted window of the railway carriage. The wrinkles of approaching age were visible round her dark eyes.

Mary was worried as she glanced sidelong into the glass. He was watching her again. Every night now for weeks he had sat opposite her on the way home. He had never said anything. Just stared. Of course when she looked at him, he was always busy reading his paper. But when her eyes left his face, she knew he watched her again. He was a pleasant-looking young man of about twenty, fair moustache and fine brown eyes. However, that unnerving gaze of his – like a cat watching a bird – haunted her. It did not matter which carriage she got into, or at what hour – he was always there. Only one thing prevented her from panicking; her journey home was a short one – a couple of minutes and she would be home. He did not leave the train; just sat there, his eyes straining to keep her in sight as the train separated them. Night after night.

Here she was at last. Without a backward glance, she headed for the exit, her heart already lifting with the thought that the bizarre nightly ordeal was over. The train whined off into darkness as she watched it go out of sight. All at once, in the darkness between the streetlights, a shadowy form moved. Panic flooded her body. Tonight he had followed her! "Walk, don't run," she said to herself. She set off again, not daring to look back.

The key clattered in her shaking hands as she searched for the lock. Then she was inside. Mary leaned against the door, exhausted with fear. Minutes went by and all was silent. She cast an anxious eye over the small flat, taking in the familiar sights with a sense of relief. She drank some hot milk and tiptoed through the flat touching her modest possessions; the bonsai plants and her collection of porcelain cats. Very soon, she heard the sound of a cat crying. She knew its call; the stray cat she had taken to feeding at nights. It wanted to come in. "But what if..." Mary looked out and there was no one in sight. Carefully, she slid back the bolt, opened the door and stepped ~~per~~ ^{out}.

"Cat!" she called. "Here boy, come in." The man! She froze. He was standing in the shadow of a large bus with the cat held firmly in his hands. She could see that he was smiling. Mary stumbled back towards the flat. Before she could close the door, she fell, sprawling painfully as she missed a step. She stared up, numbed with fear as the man towered over her.

"Mary? Mary Irwin? I want....."

He bent towards her. Mary screamed as she cast around for something to defend herself with. He was in the door, coming after her. She was as good as dead. The porcelain cats! She seized the largest, swung it back and brought it down with all her strength. There was a ghastly thud, a spurt of blood as the young man crashed to the floor and lay unconscious. Mary bent closer, scarcely breathing. He was holding something in his hands – a soiled photocopy of birth certificate dated twenty years earlier. The Christian name was illegible but the surname: I-R-V – no W-I ...

Mary shuddered uncontrollable as she let out a long, choking sob. Mary Irwin was sick with fear. After twenty years, her son had finally come home.

Adapted from Coming Home by Richard McRoberts

ALL ANSWERS MUST BE IN COMPLETE SENTENCES.

- 71 From the first paragraph, which two-word phrase suggests that Mary was in a train?

- 72 Why was Mary feeling "worried" (line 4) about the man sitting opposite her?

- 73 What was the "one thing" (line 11) that prevented Mary from panicking?

- 74 Quote the sentence that seems to suggest that Mary had found the young man's gaze uncomfortable.

- 75 In what way did the young man in the train behave differently that particular night?

76 When Mary got home, what were the two things she did to calm herself?

77 Explain fully why Mary eventually opened the door when she heard the cat mew.

78 How did Mary fall?

79 How did Mary defend herself against the young man who had entered her house?

80 The young man was Mary's son. Give an evidence in the story to support this statement.
