Every year, poachers take a whopping 38 million animals from the wilds of Brazil to meet the global demand for illegal wildlife. Most are birds, destined to become caged pets for owners in major cities around the world. It is a lucrative trade indeed.

Brazil's strong demand for exotic pets and its weak laws around the wildlife trade allow many traffickers to operate with impunity, feeding the country's $2 billion industry.

Most people have no idea that buying a parrot can have a devastating impact on nature. Smuggled birds are mistreated and injured during transport. Birds are fed the wrong food, placed in cages that were too small, and get too little or too much sun.

Brazil's wildlife is plundered in such huge numbers every day. Severe imbalances are occurring within ecosystems. Extinctions of entire local populations can happen and that affects the food chain significantly.

For as long as they can remember, Jynne Martin and April Sargent had both dreamt of going to Antarctica. This winter, they each made it to the icy continent as guests of the National Science Foundation (NSF). _____, they did not go as scientists. Martin is a poet _____ Sargent is an artist. They went to Antarctica as participants in the NSF's Artists and Writers programme. The NSF is the government agency _____ funds scientific research in Antarctica. It also makes it possible for artists, including filmmakers and musicians, to experience Antarctica and contribute _____ points of view to our understanding of the continent.

The mixing of science and art in Antarctica is _____ new. Some of the earliest explorers brought along painters and photographers. Edward Wilson was a British painter, doctor and ornithologist (bird expert) who journeyed _____ Robert Falcon Scott on two separate Antarctic expeditions more than 100 years ago. Herbert Ponting was a photographer who also accompanied Scott _____ one of those expeditions. In hundreds of photographs, Ponting captured the beauty of the continent and recorded the daily lives and heroic struggles of the explorers.

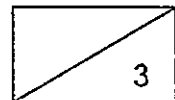

"It's important for scientists and artists to work together," said Surgent. "You need _____ different perspectives and points of view to explain the world."

_____ his projects, Surgent would use homemade pinhole cameras to take photographs that slowly developed after several days. "We are so used to digital cameras and instant images," said Surgent. "This project was a way to slow down and really look and see again."
(37)

Martin followed four different scientific teams on the ice and wrote articles and poems inspired _____ her experiences. "Each day was the new 'best' day of my life," said Martin.

The children who live at a slum in the Brazilian city of Rio de Janeiro love to play soccer on the nearby community field. However, due to constant power shortages, they (39) [ ] (40) [ ] could rarely extending their games beyond sunset. Now, with some innoveyteeve thinking and extraordinary technology, the young players would be able to use the field all night long if they wish, provided they keep running!

At this newly-renovated soccer pitch, all the kinetic energy expended by the (41) [ ] players is harnezed and used to power the lights. The hi-tech field was officially opened (42) [ ] (43) [ ] on September 10th by lagenderi soccer player, Pele. It was spearheaded with Royal Dutch Shell's "Let's Go" initiative. It encourages people to find new ways to deliver energy from cleaner and more sustainable sources.

(44) [ ] For this project, the company which was helping re-turf the deelapidayted soccer field in this impoverished area of the city, decided to partner with UK-based Pavegen that (45) [ ] (46) [ ] manufactures tiles which harvest pedestrian energy. The tiles work in conjunksion with solar panels that have also been installed around the field to feed electricity to a system of floodlights overhead.

Pavegen officials said that when the 200 tiles were being laid below the astro-turf, the children were eager to help, test the technology by played on them. Their energy stored was then used to illuminating the field at night. Pavegen's 28-year-old company director, Laurence Cook, hopes that the hi-tech soccer field would also ignite their interest in science. Made large from rubber and other recycled materials, the tiles are his brainchild. The designer revealed that it uses a system of cogs, which when stepped on, spin like tops and act as generators. Cook hopes to make the tiles affordable enough to power the entire world!

For many people, standing up in public and giving a speech is one of their greatest fears. Public speaking speeches _____ different functions and can be persuasive, informative, entertaining or celebratory in nature. (51)

There are techniques and strategies to become an _____ speaker. (52) First, make sure that you plan your communication appropriately using the correct structure. Your speech should always have a beginning, _____ and end. (53)

When writing the introduction, think about how important the first paragraph of a book is. If it does not grab your _____, you are likely to put it down. The same principle goes for your speech. From the beginning, you need to intrigue your audience. You could start with an interesting statistic, headline _____ fact that pertains to your topic and resonates with your audience. You could also use (54) storytelling as a powerful opener. (55)

In order to generate content for a topic, it would be useful to work in groups at the planning stage _____ help one another to come up with ideas. Making (56) notes about your ideas is also helpful. You could draw mind-maps, make lists or write ideas on post-it notes and then categorise them.

Do not _____ to summarise your speech and reinforce your (57) message in the conclusion.

Did you know that body language is an _____ part of public (58) speaking? In fact, 70% of communication is done through _____ body language such as posture, gestures and eye contact. Pay attention to your body (59) language. Stand up straight, take deep breaths, look at the audience _____ the eye and smile. Do not lean on one leg or use gestures that feel (60) unnatural.

Engage with your audience. Pay attention to how you are speaking. If you are

_____, you might talk quickly. Force yourself to slow down by breathing

(61)

_____ Pauses are an important part of conversation and they make you

(62)

_____ confident, natural and authentic.

(63)

Finally, avoid reading word-for-word from your notes. Instead, make a list of important points on cue cards or try to _____ what you are going to say.

(64)

_____ makes perfect! You simply cannot be a confident, compelling speaker without practice. Seek opportunities to speak in front of others by volunteering to speak during group or class activities.

(65)

Learning from others is another strategy. The famous speech by Martin Luther King 'I have a dream' was powerful and inspirational.

The euphoria of this first day in the Hukawng was catching. Even the Gurkhas' bull, with a miserly little bag of rice on its back, relished the luxury of a level track as it romped placidly. We too galloped along and surprised ourselves by covering 12 miles before nightfall stopped us at the headwaters of the fast-flowing Tanai River.

The diary records that the track was slushy - again! Evidently, there would be no escape from the intractable mud. If anyone were to fall now, it would not be from a slip on a glassy mountain but from sickness and exhaustion.

My father was not slow to explain the reasons. He did so quite coldly one day, along the lines, "Our bodies have been weakened by malnutrition so you could die from almost anything, even a cut finger. Do not eat or drink anything except cooked food and boiled water and let me know the moment you are ill. Is that clear?" I nodded my head. My father's message was clear enough but hunger overcame me.

When we stopped for a break the next day, I noticed a huge tree with reddish fruit that looked like mangoes. My resistance collapsed instantly and Father's commands went clean out of my head. I had a single overpowering vision: FOOD! Moving warily, I crept in a wide arc toward the tree while my family rested in a small clearing. However, they were not mangoes. I ate them anyway.

When I sank my teeth into one, it was juicy but intensely sour. However, hungry little boys are not choosy so I ate it all and another. I was just about to start on a third when a stern voice rang through the jungle.

"Stephen! Stephen! Where are you?"

Fear of discovery plunged me instantly into near hysteria. I dropped the guilty fruit in fright, shouted in a submissive baby voice, "Coming, Father" and dived back through the undergrowth. Alas, it was a massive thicket of giant nettles. They towered above me, but since I had never seen such plants before, I did not realise that the inch-long needles had a sting like a hornet's. My threadbare clothes gave no protection.

Suddenly, my whole body caught fire as my jangling nerves registered POISON and went into overdrive. In my ignorance, I assumed malign jungle spirits were attacking me for raiding the tree. Was I scared! I stumbled and crashed through more nettles on the way out. By the time I reached my family, I was in a dreadful state. Awash with poison, I swooned, shivered, cried, and turned into a lumpy pineapple. I was sure Father must have known what those plants were, yet I could not remember being treated with anything.

When I was able to speak out of my swollen face, I told my family that I had simply gone out into the jungle to relieve myself and got lost. Then, when Father called, I had run back through the bushes and been bitten by these things. No one disputed my story. I never referred to the episode again.

That night, we spent it in a deserted Kachin hut. It was dry. The joy of sleeping off the ground on something dry was overpowering. By popular demand, it was decided that we would spend another day there. We had a simple meal. My portion, heavily scented with wood smoke, tasted unbelievably delicious.
